INTRODUCTION

Uzbekistan is a country that breathes with the energy of its youth and takes pride in their bright future. They are our hope, our strength, our future. Young people are a unique, special and incredibly important force.

In recent years, Uzbekistan's state policy on youth has undergone a radical transformation.[1] These changes aim to actively involve young people in society, listen to their opinions, increase their social activity, and give them the opportunity to feel free and independent. In this article, we will delve deeper into the changes in Uzbekistan's state policy on youth, analyzing its positive and negative aspects, and exploring future prospects. The future of our youth, their well-being, their place in society is the responsibility of all of us. Let's work together to analyze Uzbekistan's state policy on youth in depth and find ways to work together for their future. Their bright future is our shared dream!

Methods. Youth-related state policy is a crucial factor in shaping the future of Uzbekistan. In this article, we aim to conduct a thorough analysis of this policy by utilizing the following methods and materials:

Firstly, we will carefully examine Uzbekistan's key legal documents. The Constitution, laws on education, and youth policy will help us identify the legal basis of youth-related state policy.

Secondly, we will analyze data from state statistics to study the socio-economic situation of young people, their education, employment, and other important indicators.[2] These figures will reveal the real situation of young people and help us assess the effectiveness of the policy.

Thirdly, we believe it is essential to engage directly with young people themselves. Through surveys, interviews, and focus groups, we will strive to hear their concerns, needs, and opinions firsthand. This will help us align the policy with the actual needs of young people.

Finally, we will also study youth policies in other countries to identify best practices that can be adapted to our own context. This will help us improve our own policy and create more effective programs for young people. Therefore, through the analysis of laws, figures, direct conversations with young people, and the experience of other countries, we will strive to conduct a thorough analysis of youth-related state policy in Uzbekistan.[3]

Results. A new era has begun for Uzbekistan's youth. This era is marked by their growing self-confidence, their drive to find their place in society, and their hopeful outlook on the future. It is truly heartwarming to witness these changes, to hear their aspirations, and to feel the fire burning in their hearts. Our government is implementing numerous programs to support young people and unlock their potential. These programs are designed to enhance education, employment opportunities, social engagement, and the freedom to express their thoughts.[4] Today, our youth have more opportunities than ever before to gain knowledge, showcase their talents, and find their place in society. Their eyes sparkle, and their hearts are filled with hope. Their actions and enthusiasm inspire us to look towards the future with confidence. Of course, there will be obstacles along the way, and challenges will arise.

There may be delays in implementing some programs, inequalities in resource allocation, and shortcomings in fully listening to the voices of young people. But we must work together to address these issues. Listening to the voices of young people, involving them in decision-making processes, boosting their social engagement, and strengthening their self-belief are our most crucial tasks.[5]

We are responsible for the future of our youth. It is our duty to fulfill their dreams, unleash their potential, and give them the opportunity to feel free and happy.

Discussion. Youth is our future. It's our shared dream to see them thrive, be happy and successful. In Uzbekistan, the state policy on youth has undergone significant changes in recent years. Numerous programs and projects have been implemented to integrate young people into society, expand their educational and employment opportunities, and boost their social activism.

However, the truth is, there's still much to be done.

For example, some programs are implemented very slowly, delaying young people's full utilization of opportunities. In some regions, the distribution of resources for youth programs is uneven, limiting opportunities for young people in underprivileged areas. Most importantly, there are still gaps in engaging with young people, fully understanding their needs. The level of active involvement of young people in state policy formation and implementation is still not sufficient. The role and influence of youth organizations in state policy formation are limited.

There is a need to develop long-term strategies and programs aimed at preparing young people for active participation in the development of society in the future. There is a need to improve programs that ensure young people acquire knowledge and skills that meet modern requirements.[6] We need to study successful youth policy experiences in other countries and explore the possibilities of implementing them in Uzbekistan.

It is necessary to expand cooperation with international organizations to improve state policy on youth. It's our shared dream to see them thrive, be happy and successful. Our responsibility is to expand their opportunities, hear their voices, and build a brighter future for them.

Conclusion. Uzbekistan's state policy on youth has undergone significant changes in recent years, embarking on a new path. This journey is marked by a heightened sense of self-belief among young people, their drive to find their place in society, and their hopeful outlook on the future. Programs aimed at enhancing education, employment opportunities, and social engagement have empowered them to feel free and independent. Their eyes sparkle, and their hearts are filled with hope.

However, obstacles may lie ahead.

Delays in implementing certain programs, inequalities in resource allocation, and shortcomings in fully listening to the voices of young people may arise. But we must have faith in our ability to overcome these challenges together.

Actively engaging youth in the formation and implementation of state policies, listening to their voices, boosting their social engagement, and strengthening their self-belief are our most crucial tasks.

Uzbekistan's state policy on youth can become even more effective by developing long-term strategies and programs that prepare young people to actively participate in the development of society in the future. Let's work together for a brighter future for our youth! It is our duty to fulfill their dreams, unleash their potential, and give them the opportunity to feel free and happy.

The bright future of our youth is our shared dream!
